What Are Your Miranda Rights?

The Miranda "warning" should be spoken to you when you are arrested. A police officer or other official must, by law, tell you the full "Miranda warning" to warn you about your rights to not say anything that might make you look guilty. The Miranda warning gives you the following rights:

You have the right to remain silent

Anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law

You have the right to an attorney

If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed for you

This means when an officer "reads you your rights," you aren't required by law to speak with the police and may request an attorney.

The name comes from a historic 1966 U.S. Supreme Court case called Miranda v. Arizona, declaring that whenever a person is taken into police custody, before being questioned they must be told of the Fifth Amendment right not to make any self-incriminating statements. The following is an overview of your Fifth Amendment Miranda rights, including when police must read you your rights and what happens when they fail to do so.

#6 Annotation 14th - Amendment.

So at this time I will invoke both CONSTITUTIONAL MY RIGHTS UNDER BOTH THE FIFTH AND FOURTEENTH ADMENDMENT'S
